person interaction can take place at very high levels of efficiency and low cost. A significant number of these interactions take the form of social networking, where users generate content, such as posts, comments, and the like, and share information about themselves by sending it to other users of the social network. Social networking sites thus benefit from increased user participation, and are able to employ new applications for tracking and analyzing user activity. The ever-increasing number of users has created a significant volume of data that is associated with user activities. Social networking site operators often focus on developing methods for tracking user activity, and for presenting this information in a meaningful way. Various methods are used to track user activity. Some methods rely on a person-to-person connection between users to facilitate this tracking. However, many of the social networking users are not in an active mode and are, therefore, rarely in contact with other users. Thus, a substantial volume of user activity data is not found among the social networking sites.A team of researchers from Microsoft, George Mason University, Stanford University, and the University of Utah have developed a high-throughput low-cost sequencing process for sequencing the HCMV genome. Their simple system, called "CHROMIPLEX," makes it possible to characterize the HCMV genome without the 3e33713323
