He brought along hundreds of pages of documents for his meeting with Modi, supposedly to show the Indian government that New Delhi's poorest citizens are being hurt by the president's economic policies. The documents covered everything from the policy rate to the percentage of people living in poverty. Convinced that he had covered the ground in his talks with the Indian government, Kushner shared his "biggest takeaway" with The Washington Post: "India wants to join the world economy" and "now it's a democracy." That being the case, it is ridiculous to compare India's economic trajectory to China's. The same holds true for India's democracy. Asia's largest democracy is no more than 70 years old. It has all the classic democratic problems, from the overwhelming concentration of power in the hands of a small class of politically connected people to the lack of true meritocracy to inform the governing elite's policy-making decisions. But China does not have a democratic government. As Adity 0cc13bf012
