In an effort to market to the 30 million Americans who suffer from food allergies, McDonald's rolled out new burger packaging that carries the warning:

"WARNING: May contain traces of nuts."
The new information on the packaging, which was first spotted at the Corporate Headquarters in Oak Brook, Illinois, is a significant shift from the "WARNING: This product is made in a facility where peanuts are present" caption printed on the old packaging. Despite the new packaging, McDonald's has not changed its nutritional information on its website, nor have the company representatives I interviewed when I visited the Oak Brook headquarters. According to McDonald's corporate representatives, the new packaging is in response to consumer demands. Their explanation is credible because the McDonald's chain's food allergy group is dedicated to fighting back against nut allergies by educating consumers about the risks of food allergies. You can learn more about McDonald's food allergy efforts by reading this recent article from the Chicago Tribune. In his own new book, "Snack Freak: The Hungry Gene--Why We Love to Eat", New York Times writer Andrew Weil tells the story of how those food allergies have changed our lives. Speaking with McDonald's Vice President Kim Carstensen, he asked her if McDonald's food allergies had changed their philosophy about food allergies. "Absolutely," Carstensen said. "There are three things that I think are most important to McDonald's. Number one is quality, number two is consistency and number three is customer service. So we are absolutely thinking about the allergies and that is one of the things that our customer's bring up." McDonald's has been working on the packaging change since 2008, and the food allergy group was established in 2008. "We realized that the message was not getting through," Carstensen said. "We realized
