The present invention relates to a method for the automatic production of straps for eyeglasses, and more particularly of an industrial method for the forming of metal disks into eyeglass straps made of a synthetic substance, specifically a synthetic resin. Eyeglass straps may be made in two different ways, of which the first is the "darning" method where eyeglass straps are made up of two discs which are joined together by a thermosetting resin, the discs being joined together by leaving a free margin between them. This method is not fully automatic, as the human hand must join the two discs at the free margin. In the second method, the straps are made by molding a single disc from a plastic material, using a mold that has a recess for the eye portion of the eyeglasses, and a strap portion to be placed around the nose and ears of the eyeglasses. The molding method is fully automatic, however, it suffers from the drawback of not being able to obtain eye-adjustable eyeglass straps, because the strap portion has a fixed shape and size to accommodate the shape and size of the
