The Downbeat (for 2, 3, or 4 players) is a traditional children's game used for teaching rhythms. For example, it is the name for a song of the same name. Like some of the dances of Arabia, America, and Europe, the Downbeat was introduced to the United States by the 19th-century Czech, Moravian, and Hungarian immigrants. It originated with the Bohemian and Moravian Children's singing and dancing gatherings. Through them, the simple 4/4 movement appeared very similar to the modern "East Coast Swing." It is believed that the children's dance and songs were brought to America by the Czech and Moravian immigrants in the late 1800s. At that time, the children's dancing became very popular with adults. First, the teacher must demonstrate the basic dance movements to the children, which are listed below and shown in the picture below. The teacher must teach the traditional poses and steps that go with the song, and must match the steps to the song. The Downbeat teaches children a simple 4/4 rhythm, from the distinctive colors of each step, until they become good enough at the four-steps, and can correctly interpret and play the pattern with a musical beat. Children must learn to identify five separate parts of the simple, first four-step 4/4 in the Downbeat. These nine (9) component parts are listed in the table of components below, a child should learn to recognize the four steps in the first four places, and the fifth part, the downbeat, is usually in the
