Online Copyright Infringement Liability Limitation Act (OCILLA), for example, is your internet service provider's indemnity against third-party online copyright infringement claims. But the DMCA and copyright trolling are not the only ways to have your access to the internet infringed. The YouTube's and Twitch's hate speech and racism and other agenda-driven censorship has also been an active area of concern, as we have recently seen in the Twitch bans of popular gamers and streamers, as well as the Gamergate issues. And even among established game and anime streamers, their content is hardly free of controversy. After all, not all games are equal. In fact, they usually don't. There are always some jokers that do not care about obscenity or racial slurs on their content, and are just being edgy. But there are also those that just have an agenda against certain types of games. And then there are also those that just want to see how much people would jump off the 2nd floor of an enclosed elevator. As the internet have become the go-to source for information, misinformation, cultural exchange and commercial profit, it also has become the means for people to cause harm as well. A lot of the time, their main motivation is financial gain, while other times it is just to see how many people are willing to watch the variety of live streamer's content. Either way, you will see that some just start an account with no intention of doing anything productive. But then, as time goes by, they find themselves bullied by trolls and harassers until they begin to share their opinions. Others find themselves targeted by the government. Some find themselves struggling to balance their livelihood with their passion in a society where advocating for unpopular causes is met with negative response and outright harassment. Either way, with great power comes great responsibility, or in this case, internet power. To limit people's freedom of expression, one need not only have the resources to fight in a legal battle. He/she can also use technology to silence their detractors. And the latest example of this is the ", for example, is your internet service provider's
