This proposal addresses an important and increasingly relevant problem in the field of cell biological and biomedical research; that is, how to better understand and study pathogenic microorganisms. This proposal focuses on Mycobacterium tuberculosis (Mtb), an infectious bacterium that causes 10 million human cases of tuberculosis and 2 million deaths every year. Conventional methods of studying Mtb pathogenesis have focused on only one aspect of the tuberculosis infection, that is the macrophage, one of two cell types in the human body that can successfully defend against the pathogen. During the course of an infection, Mtb first enters the human host, multiplies in phagocytes, and then spreads to other organs, causing disease. While it is clear that such phagocyte-mediated processes are important for understanding the pathogenicity of Mtb, these processes alone cannot explain the molecular details of Mtb pathogenesis. We propose to perform studies that will help expand our understanding of Mtb pathogenesis by focusing not just on the macrophage, but on the second host cell type encountered by Mtb during the infection, the T cell. Using a powerful combination of genomics, proteomics, and microfluidics techniques, we will determine how Mtb-infected T cells resist cell death and persist within the human host. This unique approach will provide new insights into the molecular and cellular basis of Mtb infection that will lead to new therapeutic strategies for treating tuberculosis. General characteristics of the endocrine cells of the human esophageal mucosa. Endocrine cells of the esophageal mucosa were observed in six human autopsy samples in different stages of the cancer process. The first appearance of the cells was in the mucosal glands of the lower part of the esophagus, the level where the antral gastrin-producing cells are located. The most numerous of these cells resemble gastrin-producing cells, but the majority of them is immunoreactive to serotonin and a lesser number to somatostatin. The ratio of endocrine cells
