The aim of this study was to establish baseline data for ancillary investigations into the effect of iron supplementation on iron balance in rhesus monkeys. To determine the relationship between the iron and non-haem iron sources in the diet and the bioavailability of iron, iron levels were measured in six-month-old Rhesus monkeys fed a combination of plant and animal sources of iron. In the older monkeys, the diet was supplemented with ferrous salts to increase iron availability, and iron levels were measured in plasma and plasma ultrafiltrate (100 kDa cut-off) using inductively coupled plasma atomic emission spectrometry. Iron was detected in all monkeys, with levels of 884 +/- 182 nmol/L in plasma and 68.4 +/- 13.4 nmol/L in plasma ultrafiltrate. Only trace amounts of iron were found in the cerebrospinal fluid. The main sources of iron in the diets were plant (30%), which
