The authors underline the interest of a combined treatment by vascular surgery in cases of combined lesions involving arterial and venous sites. They report their own experience of this combined treatment for combined lesions of the popliteal arteries and vein. In addition, by a review of the current literature, they show that there is a lack of well-documented studies in this subject and that indications are often confounded by different standards of quality in evaluation of the results of vascular surgery. This lack of documented data forces the authors to rely on literature studies and personal cases.Facial pain as a cause of blindness. To test the hypothesis that the prevalence of trigeminal neuropathic pain is higher among patients who have been blind for long durations compared to patients who are blind because of other causes. Sixty-seven consecutive patients who had been blind for an average of 23 years and 60 patients who were not blind were enrolled in the study. All underwent an ophthalmic and neurological examination. The average duration of the blind period was 23 years, ranging from a few months to more than 50 years. Nerve conduction studies (NCS) and trigeminal evoked potentials (TEPs) were recorded from all patients using percutaneous stimulation of the infraorbital nerve via the infraorbital foramen. Patients with a history of previous eye surgery were excluded. All but 7 of the patients were right-handed and the average age was 55 years. NCS and TEP were successfully recorded from 67% and 73% of the patients, respectively, and there were no differences in the results of these tests according to the cause of blindness. In contrast, when the presence of current facial pain was tested, the response rate was 85% in the blind group compared with only 40% in the control group (n=
