Numerous studies have shown that substitution of a peptide spanning the MHC class I binding cleft of a tumor antigen can transform tumor antigen presentation from that which is naturally presented by self to that which is naturally presented by tumors. The tumor-associated antigens (TAAs) (GORecs' C1t, tT1, and gp100) represent the best candidates for such a peptide to target. However, clinical evaluations with such peptide-based vaccines have been disappointing. The primary reasons for these disappointing results, as with those with other MHC class I tumor-associated antigens, include low antigenicity, poor T-cell priming, and/or inefficient tumor cell uptake of exogenous peptides. (Boon et al., 1994; Boon, 1996; Jones et al., 1996; Topalian et al., 1996). There remains a need, therefore, to improve the immune recognition and stimulation of tumor-associated antigen-specific immune responses. Previous studies have reported on the use of the vitamin A-complemented CD4 and CD8 T cells to enhance the cytolytic response of antigen-specific CTLs. (Mallery et al., 1996; Mallery et al., 1997). This appears to be accomplished by the induction of a broader set of cytokines and to the upregulation of the activity of chemokine receptor CCR7. The concept of using the vitamin A-complemented CD4 and CD8 T cells has recently been adapted for a more general sense. Rosenberg et al., (1997) reported that delivery of IFN- γ via a retrovirus in a delayed-type hypersensitivity (DTH) model was strongly augmentative to priming by vitamin A and retinoid. Similarly, Lima et al. (1997) reported that a retroviral-delivered IL-2 could enhance the number of IFN- γ producing cells. However, the parameters for activating a cytotoxic T cell response by using a retrovirus vector appear to be different from the parameters for priming a naive T cell to become a MHC-restricted CTL. In addition, the types of cytokines which are released by a vaccine may influence the T cell. One key factor in the induction of an immune response against a tumor antigen is the type and number of cytokines released by the vaccine. With regard to the induction of tumor-specific CTLs, (Paul et al., 1995; Gattinoni
