Moreover, the handling of infectious waste has long been an area of concern. Current regulations require that healthcare workers carefully clean their hands prior to handling medical waste. Further, when handling medical waste, it is important to ensure that the healthcare worker is protected from blood or blood-borne pathogens. The most common way to ensure the removal of such infectious substances is to use sterilized gloves or hand protection devices. Recently, however, the concern of healthcare workers has increased because of the potential harm to patients if healthcare workers are infected by an individual patient during a procedure. Further, healthcare workers are being held accountable for the cross-contamination of other patients. For example, the CDC has recommended that healthcare workers wash their hands several times with a disinfectant agent before and after handling potentially infectious biological materials. Although, the use of gloves or hand protection devices is one way to ensure that individuals are protected from potentially infectious substances, they are often difficult to use and uncomfortable to wear. Typically, gloves or hand protection devices include a foam layer having a waterproof membrane on the inside of the glove. The foam layer is thick and tends to restrict the motion of the user.

In addition, the hand protection device needs to be used with a disinfectant after each use to ensure that they are free from harmful infectious substances. There are many difficulties associated with applying disinfectant to the gloves or hand protection device after each use. First, the glove material is difficult to wet properly. If the glove or hand protection device is wet, the disinfectant cannot be effectively applied. Second, once the glove or hand protection device is wet, there is no easy way to remove the disinfectant. Third, the glove or hand protection device may have an unpleasant feel after repeated use. The disinfectant may also make the glove or hand protection device slippery.

Accordingly, there is a need for a new hand protection device that is easy to use, comfortable to wear, disinfectant resistant, and less slippery. There is a further need for a container or package for the hand protection device.Q: Exact solution of the "Indexed Dynamic Block Diagonalization" (IDBD) problem
