Now new research in the U.K. shows that by combining a nanomaterial with a food base, glow-in-the-dark bacteria can live and grow in the dark and on light-sensitive fruits and vegetables, like apples and pears. Glow-in-the-dark bacteria might make rotting food easier to identify at night, as well as possibly help farmers preserve crops from light-dependent bacteria like yeast, which could affect the flavor of apples and pears, researchers said. The technology also could be put to use to identify food that's been mishandled during transportation and storage, or that has gone bad before anyone has had a chance to see it, said study leader Nick Withers, a food scientist at the University of Leicester in England. "They're a pretty exciting idea to expand the applications of bacteria that are usually associated with food spoilage," he said. The new research is detailed in the Oct. 24 issue of the journal Applied and Environmental Microbiology. Any fruit or vegetable can potentially be infected by bacteria that
