It does not provide an interface for other archiving tools.Inspired by the B19 gene, which links major inherited disease with cancer, a novel approach to cancer therapy could have potentially beneficial effects for cancer patients. The technique, described in Nature Medicine, holds promise as a potential new class of drug that would attack cancers caused by defective proteins known as kinases. Although the drug has cancer-fighting potential, its therapeutic target is a different kind of defective protein -- one called a glycoprotein IIb/IIIa or GPIIb/IIIa receptor. GPIIb/IIIa receptors are calcium-dependent integrins that bind and activate coagulation proteins, triggering platelet aggregation, and thus blood clotting. In blood, GPIIb/IIIa receptors help form a plug to stop bleeding after a wound has been created. After the plug has formed, blood flows through small channels formed by platelets that have aggregated around the lesion. These channels form a seal that helps to stop fluid loss from the wound. The channels then break down to dissolve the blood clot. It is this function that is the problem for GPIIb/IIIa receptor-associated diseases, such as unstable angina, myocardial infarction and stroke. These diseases are characterized by a build-
