I had to remove the warranty and sign the EULA to do this, so I hope this helps someone. The "Ikebukuro Incidents," AKA The Red Spectacles Incident, and other spectacles from the Sengoku era of history, become reality when you play the role of Kazuma Kiryu or Yagami Light. In the original game "Ikebukuro - A Virtual Reality Work of Fiction" published by DMM, Kiryu investigates "The Red Spectacles Incident" as a detective through a virtual reality headset. The title will be published in English in 2017. This version of "Ikebukuro VR Work of Fiction" is a complete port of "Ikebukuro - A Virtual Reality Work of Fiction" that was originally a DMM title. It is the first complete version of the title in the series.Q: Database design, having "special" columns and mutating In python, say i have a set of objects class Foo(object): def __init__(self, data): self.data = data self.prop = 1 self.get_data = lambda : self.data self.update = lambda data : setattr(self, "prop", data) I have a couple of users inserting Foo objects in the same DB at once but with different data. I would like the update to set the prop to a different value (depending on the supplied data), when i make a copy (or clone) of the object (with its get_data unchanged). Is this possible using SQL? Maybe even a "dynamic update" on SQLAlchemy, where i could include a parameter as a part of the UPDATE statement? A: If you want a version control system implemented in a DB, you'd have to modify the database completely. (Long running, maintenance systems are always up to date, and the processing time of the data after being changed is not something you'd need to worry about) A dynamic way to modify it in sql alchemy is to use a Window Function and a version column in the query from sqlalchemy import func q = (Session() .query(MyTable) .filter(MyTable.version == 1)) q.update(func.current_version(), other_data_casing) c9d1549cdd imony. In an online address at Friday's memorial service, the nature scientist told members of the University of Chicago's Fellowships of the Foundations of Science in Natural History, the current administration and others that "not just science, but all of humankind, will be in your debt." In his address, and in subsequent comments to reporters, Darwin referred disparagingly to the controversy over his test results. The peer-reviewed reports suggest he was wrong when he wrote that natural selection creates new species and eliminates others. After more than a century, Darwin's findings are still being tested, challenged and revised. Darwin's message in his online address to an auditorium of some 300 researchers, graduate students and their mentors in biology was crafted with human warmth and humor. "The evidence for evolution by natural selection was discovered over 150 years ago," said Darwin, "but its scientific understanding has only recently begun to reach a degree of maturity. I look forward to the day when this Darwin's Testimony can become an integral part of the curriculum for every university." Darwin, who was a member of the Department of Biology until his death this week, also had addressed the Fellowships' group previously, in a 2003 talk "What the Fossil Record Shows." The following is a complete transcript of his online address. Copyright 2007. All rights reserved. University of Chicago Press The first broadly accepted view of evolution was posited by Charles Darwin in his 1859 book, On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection. It suggested that all animal life evolved from a single common ancestor for all life on earth, and that any evolutionary traits that developed would be passed on to the next generation by selective breeding. The unifying concept, natural selection, was first enunciated in a privately published preface to George Struve's 1844-1855 work, On the Variation and Geological Structure of Animals, long before it was integrated into the scientific view of evolution. In Darwin's view, these concepts define the standard parameters of natural history. Did Darwin unwittingly truncate
