Web developers have long known how to use mouse and keyboard, but when it comes to touch screen interfaces, it's still quite new. Few actually find the methods people use to identify and interact with touch-enabled screens natural. Many developers have been exposed to these interactions only as a software developer. If they're used to dealing with touch screens in day-to-day life, they're more likely to make their programs a lot better. Touch interface design experiments are being conducted to see if touch is really the future of interaction. Design experiments Software design experiments are often less successful than they should be. For example, the Philips Human Interface Lab conducted a series of interaction design experiments with 3D accelerometers as part of their innovative work on haptic feedback. The results of their design experiments were pretty interesting. Haptic feedback generates a sense of force, vibration, or speed on the finger to make objects easier to select. They looked at how to make a touch screen most naturally approachable with a 3D touchpad. In a well-documented video, their primary experiment shows how people touch the screen after three years of training. The video shows that after two years of practice, people's fingers are 6d1f23a050
